AMST 301 – Reproduction in America

Reproduction in America will provide historical context for human reproduction and examine the ways in which women and men adapted and shaped reproductive practices to the unique events of their lives.

From infertility treatments to abortion debates, reproduction sits at the center of American life, personal identity, and cultural controversy. Reproductive history vividly illuminates essential ideas about women and men and their roles in American culture.

Class discussion will use reproductive theory, archival sources, oral histories, and individual narratives to look at the personal and political impacts of reproductive policy. Students will study historical changes in reproductive practices and interpret contemporary controversies in light of reproductive history.

For more information contact Jennifer Hill (jhill@montana.edu) or the History & Philosophy Department.